Letter from the EDs

Hello from us at Wellstone!

For over 15 years, we have championed a politics that improves people's lives and committed to building a democracy where everybody counts. Today, we are more committed to this vision than ever before.

This is a time of phenomenal transformation for us, and it's all happening within the reality of our political climate, which is turbulent and uncertain. We see our communities targeted by hateful rhetoric and horrific policies. And we've joined our communities in fighting back and demanding better.

Whether it's the cohort of women who are breaking glass ceilings by running for statewide office in places like Georgia, Idaho, and Minnesota, or the dozens of organizers in Ohio, Missouri, and Colorado who are running progressive ballot measures in the absence of legislative leadership, or the hundreds of technologists who are protecting communities from the Trump administration through organizing, fundraising and protests, Wellstone alumni remain at the forefront of the progressive movement.

This year, we've zeroed in on what it means to practice a more inclusive politics, to transform our democracy so that everyone's in, nobody's out, no exceptions. We've expanded our understanding of what justice looks like for all our people, and we're equipping our leaders with the skill sets, tools, and frameworks to advance our inclusive vision, one that centers racial and gender justice alongside economic justice in building the politics we deserve.

We don't do this work alone, and we're grateful for what you've made possible, including:

- Delivering first-class training and leadership development: Our people gain skills to change the world through strategic community engagement, and redefine what it means to win not in spite of our values, but because of them.
- Integrating new learnings, tools, and tactics to fully invest in our trainers and alumni: Continuing to democratize knowledge, skills, and resources with people of color, women, immigrants, gender-nonconforming, queer, and LGBT folks, people with disabilities, working-class people, and survivors—by building inclusive training experiences that acknowledge and invest in their leadership.
- Continuing to shape and invest in the inclusive democracy movement: Supporting individuals and organizations to reimagine the rules of our democracy to ensure that our organizing, electoral and public policy campaigns are bolstered, rather than hindered, by our public structures (courts, voting systems, etc.)

- Hosting RootsCamp in Baltimore, MD this November: This year, we hope to see nearly 1,000 organizers from across the country at the premier “unconference” for our movement to debrief the midterm elections and share best practices for the future.
- Undergoing an organizational rebrand: This means we'll have a new name, a new look, and most importantly: we'll have an updated identity that reflects the fullness and depth of the thousands of hearts and minds that have influenced our work over the last fifteen years.

We plan to focus intensively on these areas with an eye towards our ultimate goal: If we train progressives to run values-based and people-centered campaigns and organizations, we can have a more inclusive politics that sees and serves our people.

In the middle of what is hard, there is also hope. In this moment, we're committed to staying clear-headed and confident about our values, and look forward to building with you in the years to come.

In solidarity, and with gratitude,

Sara Beth Mueller
Acting Executive Director

Jessie Ulibarri
Outgoing Co-Executive
Director

“If we train progressives to run values-based and people-centered campaigns and organizations, we can have a more inclusive politics that sees and serves our people.”

Trainer Spotlight: Amber J. Phillips

Amber's dynamic approach to digital and cultural organizing continues to shape our Movement Technology work—here's more on her passion and connection to Wellstone:

“I saw that the work here was more than transactional organizing. It was a place that wanted to reach new people that weren't being talked to, the people who aren't voting.”

— AMBER J. PHILLIPS

Amber is an organizer, writer, digital strategist, multimedia creative, and host for a popular podcast, The Black Joy Mixtape. She began her organizing journey in 2011 registering voters because she wanted to ensure that the needs and vision of her community would be included in the larger political agenda, rather than as an afterthought. Since then, Amber's passions have only expanded and now include digital and cultural organizing.

How do you think about your relationship with Wellstone?

I'm a trainer—digital is constantly evolving, and if you're not innovating then you get left behind. I am always taking in information in real time and updating my curriculum. Wellstone is a place where I share that evolution. I see myself as an active part of this organization and in the work.

Why do you continue to build with the organization?

After the 2016 election, I wanted to quit political work. I was tired of begging people to center communities of color and to build with us. As a field organizer, I was upset that GOTV was the only time I heard from organizations. It enforced the message that communities of color don't deserve political education or to be included in conversation about politics. When a white supremacist was elected into office, I felt done. Communities of color didn't turn out in the Presidential election because you did not give them a good reason to.

For Wellstone to come to me after the election and ask, “We still want to learn; can you teach us and help us shape our curriculum?”—that kept me invested in the work. I saw that the work here was more than transactional organizing. It was a place that wanted to reach new people that weren't being talked to, the people who aren't voting.

I am only invested in organizations that can admit: We lost. We can do better. Let's work with new people to figure out how to win, instead of centering the same people who cost us this loss. How about we talk to people in a deeper more meaningful way? We need a new way of doing this work.

That is what Wellstone is doing.

What's most exciting to you about the next phase of this organization?

It's the hard conversations around race, class, gender and power, the work of figuring out what is important, and how that needs to be reflected in the organization, the curriculum, the Board of Directors, and the audience—that makes me super excited.

We love our trainer community—for more stories of the people and ideas that shape our work, check out www.wellstone.org/about/trainers

New: Online Coding Cohorts

We are thrilled to share that this summer, we launched our first-ever Online Coding Cohorts: a series of intensive, four to six week long online training programs. Our Movement Technology team is passionate about democratizing coding and engineering knowledge so that all of our communities can benefit from technology. Here are five reasons you should be excited about this program:

The content is vast and powerfully practical.

We teach: VAN/EveryAction administration, Fundamentals of Movement Engineering in Python, Fundamentals of SQL with GIS and using HTML/CSS in Action Network: We cover how to custom design and implement design pages and emails in the Action Network platform, although the skills are transferable to many systems.

We apply a race, class and gender lens to the Online Data and Coding Cohorts.

A unique component about our online training program is our grounding principle: we believe that technology cannot exist in a world that is absent of race, class, gender, and power dynamics. This means we equip trainees on making strategic decisions like: reaching communities where they are, and ensuring the data they're using reflects the fullness of people and their experiences. We work hard to show that leadership in the field of coding and technology CAN actually look and feel radically different than what some of us have been taught to believe.

The trainings are all online, making them as accessible as possible.

We chose to launch the coding cohorts online with the hopes to make this program accessible to people across the movement, particularly those with children, disabilities, or those who cannot travel or take time off to join us for our in-person trainings. All courses are offered at a fraction of their price point in person.

We designed the online trainings to be for a wide range of people.

We created the Online Coding Cohorts for people who have a variety of experiences and skill sets. The online trainings are for community organizers, activists, campaigners, data managers, and others who identify themselves as doing work in the broader progressive movement. It's for people who have experience in electoral campaigns, community organizing, or issue-campaign work. The spectrum is broad! The only requirement is that trainees have some organizing experience under their belt. We believe that if you're familiar with community organizing, then you are prone to understand the fundamentals of movement technology.

We are fostering the next generation of diverse movement engineers.

We launched the Online Coding Cohorts because the technology field continues to be stratified and inaccessible for so many of our communities. We want to change that.

If we know that we need representative leadership in our government, campaigns, tech, and in our overall movement—we need software and tech that will have a positive impact in our communities.

This is what we define as movement engineering—tech that improves people's lives.

Donor Profile: Linda Hanson & Jon Wallach

Like many of our donors, Jon Wallach and Linda Hanson came to Wellstone Action through Senator Wellstone's direct mail list in the 1990s. But they're major donors because of our work. "We support Wellstone because it's focused on providing the tools to build and sustain progressive organizations beyond the next election cycle. Long-game, unsexy, movement building organizing is what we love to fund the most," said Jon.

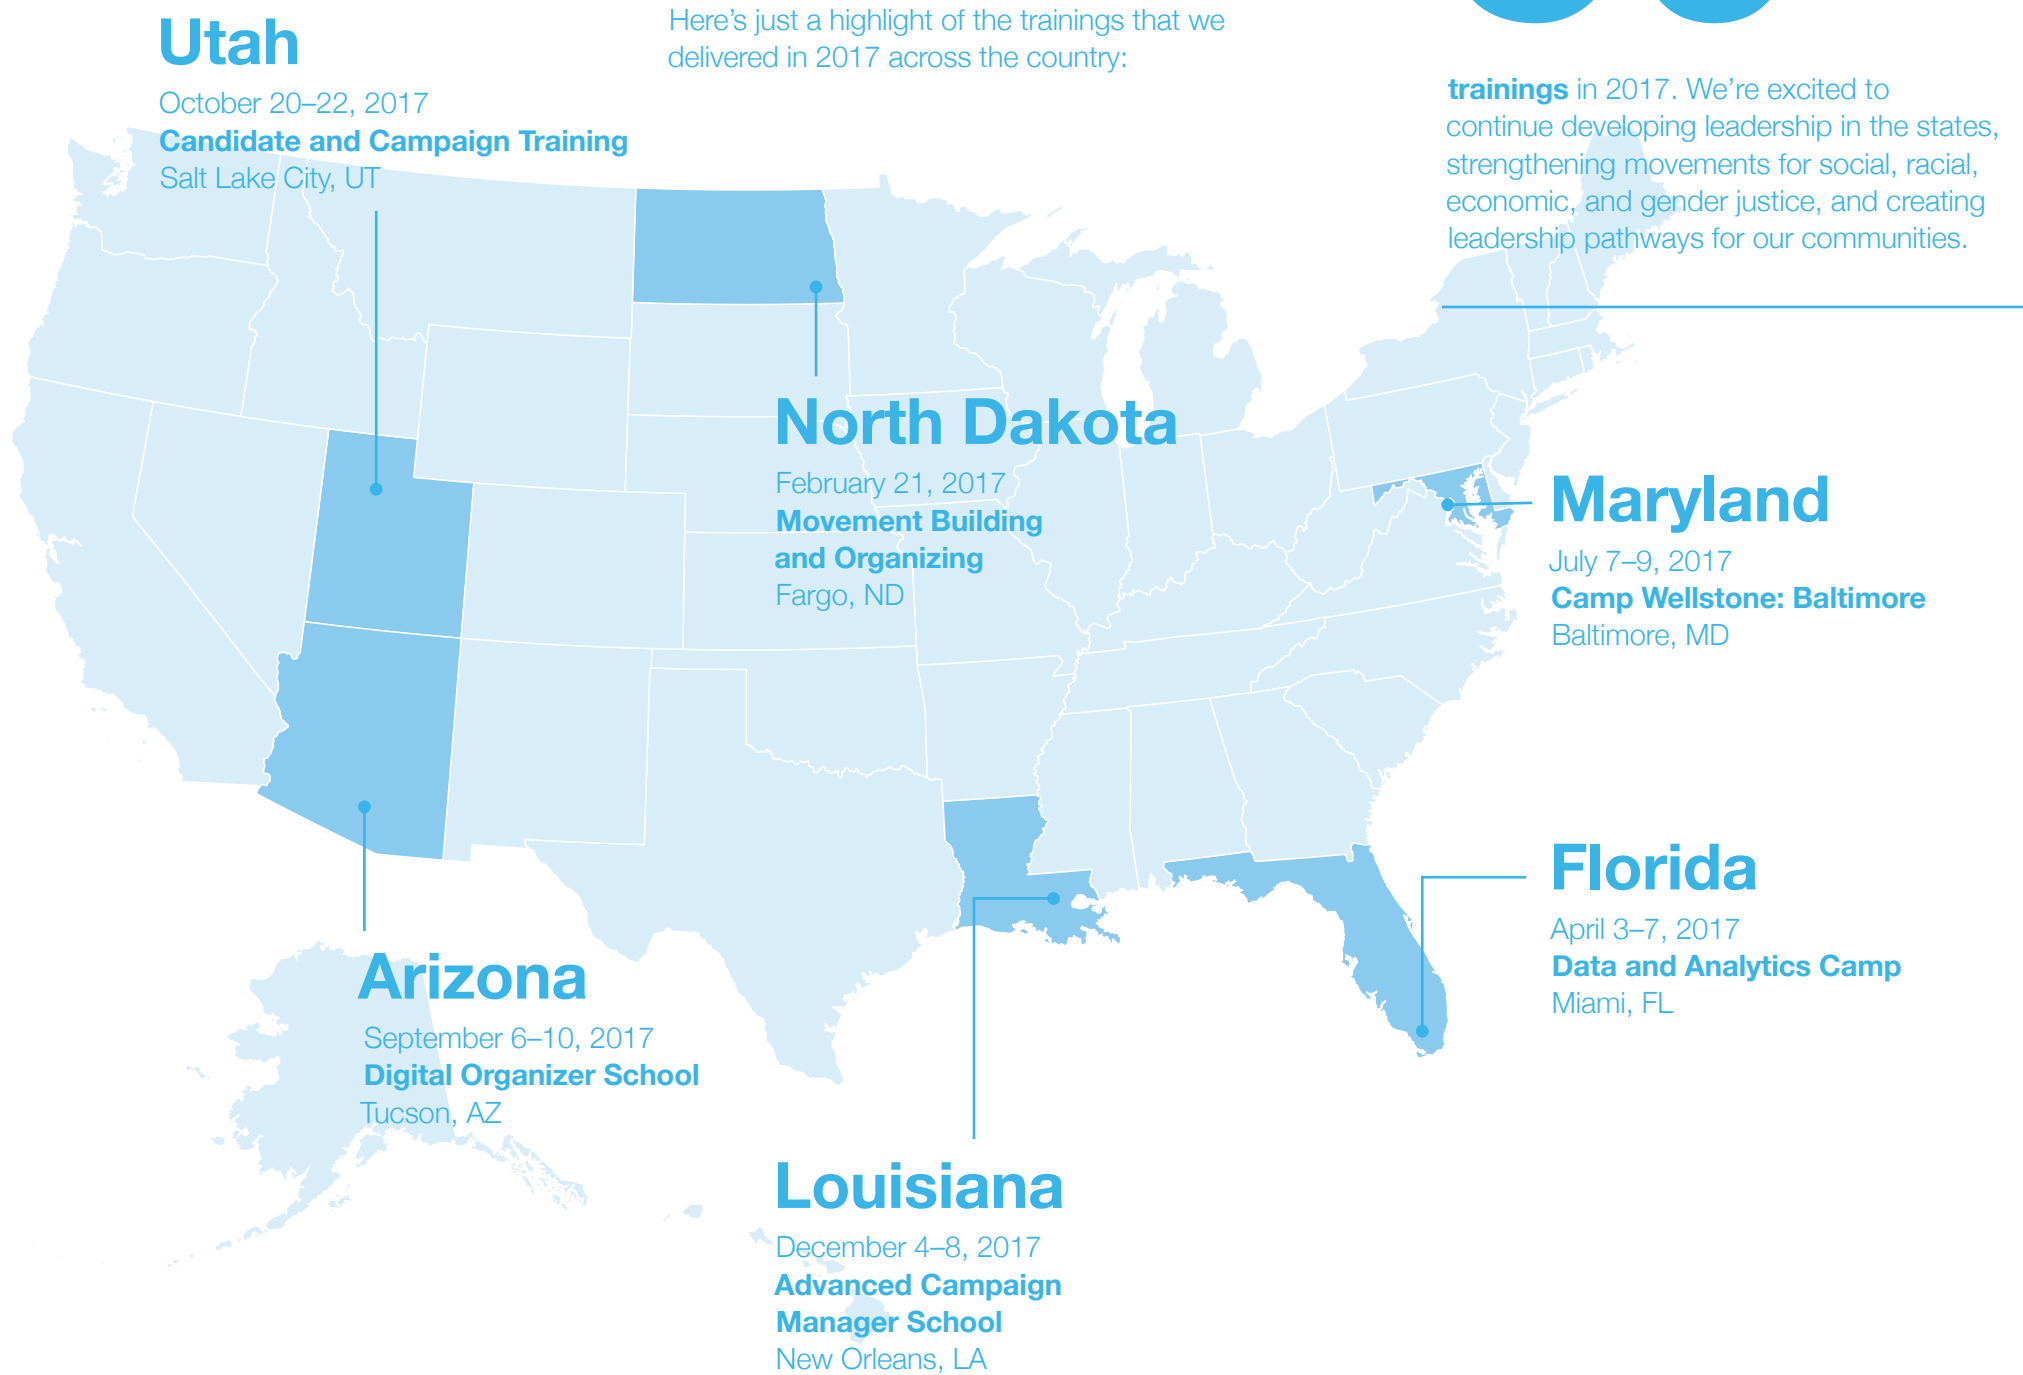

Linda is actively involved in her statewide teachers' union, the Massachusetts Teachers Association. Jon works for consumer and environmental organizations across the country who are fighting to provide affordable and sustainable electric power to their communities. Their two sons are also active in the movement. Through their sons' activities, Jon and Linda have seen the power of youth engaging in organizing and community-building.

"That is exactly why we feel so strongly about Wellstone's work," Linda said. "It's about recruiting and training the next generation of leaders from communities who've been most adversely impacted by the status quo—students, women, low-income folks, and folks of color. And it's going to take long-game vision and commitment to get those leaders engaged from the very beginning to change the progressive infrastructure. That's why we fund Wellstone."
